Tobacco kept in it will never become dry, but preserve its sweetness and aroma even longer than when preserved in tin foil.

Diet an Essential Aid to Medicine in the Treatment of Chronic Diseases.

Drs. Beckman & Pixley, of 21 West 122nd St., New York City, whose special and comprehensive method of treating chronic diseases by correspondence has been set forth in the two preceding issues of this paper, carefully prepare as part of their treatment such courses of diet as the varied conditions of a patient and the ailments may require.

Upon concluding the diagnosis of a case and deciding the line of treatment to be administered, a diet schedule is sent to the patient, together with the medicines and instructions, in which is indicated the forms of food and drink best calculated to nourish and build up the system by replacing material destroyed by the disease, and also to harmonize with the medicine prescribed.

This is a most important feature of their professional care and is highly appreciated as being of itself productive of material benefit.

An individual suffering from Chronic Rheumatism could never be cured by medical treatment alone if he continued to eat and drink certain things. The effect of the most powerful remedy may be wholly counteracted by the patient's customary diet and habits.

The importance of experienced attention to these matters as well as to the compounding of the medicines prescribed will therefore be readily understood.

The long experience of Drs. Beckman & Pixley enable them to determine the individual needs of a patient from the reports rendered upon their regular statement blanks, and their acknowledged skill may thus be brought to bear upon a sufferer from any disease in his own home, however distant it may be.

An individual statement blank, explaining more fully their plan, will be mailed upon request.
